In many societies, women have historically been confined to the domestic sphere, while men have been the primary breadwinners. Women have typically been responsible for childrearing, cooking, and cleaning, while men have been responsible for farm work, hunting, and home repairs. In recent years, women have increasingly entered the workforce, but they still tend to earn less than men and are often confined to lower-level positions. Women are also underrepresented in politics and government.

There is no one answer to this question as the role of women in society varies greatly from culture to culture. In some societies, women are highly respected and play an important role in the community, while in others they are seen as second-class citizens with few rights.

In general, women's involvement in politics helps to ensure that women's voices are heard on issues that affect them, such as healthcare, education, and workplace discrimination. Additionally, women in politics can serve as role models for other women, showing that it is possible to succeed in a male-dominated field.
